Resources for expanding services

SANE programs might choose to add other patient populations in addition to sexual assault survivors, but should only do so slowly and with intention once the program is stable and sustainable (financially, collaboratively and from a staffing standpoint). How you decide what services to add, and in what order, can be decided based on clinical factors, such as emergency department census and billing and coding information, or it can be decided based on a more formal assessment of community needs.

Regardless, programs want to be careful they don't add too many patient populations at once and should ensure that resources match the prospective influx of patients. Keep in mind that a program that has just enough staff to care for all of the sexual assault patients coming in will be hard-pressed to manage a patient load that could double or triple (or more) depending on the expansion plan. Staff will need additional didactic and clinical education to be able to appropriately care for other types of patients. Not all forensic patients are alike; they will have some issues unique to the type of violence or relationship of the assailant to the victim. Programs that have an eye toward expansion should prepare well in advance by attending to the expanded education of their clinical team.

See the Program Expansion Worksheet in this section for help assessing your readiness and need for expansion.

Paying for expanded practice also is an issue that must be thoroughly examined. Unlike sexual assault, which has a built-in criminal justice reimbursement process, other types of interpersonal violence do not. Programs will need to identify sources of funding to cover the cost of these patients. Billing for services is one viable way; others might choose to pursue additional funds through grants or fundraising efforts.

See billing and fundraising tools in the Funding section.

Programs should not assume that their organizations will absorb these costs. Even if that is the initial plan, for the sake of sustainability, additional funding sources must be identified. Whatever the pathway, this is another aspect of practice that must be addressed before expanded practice actually occurs.
